“Managed futures is one of the world’s non-correlated asset classes and should be considered in any modern portfolio.” ~ Scott Slutsky, author of Master of the Futures

Managed futures have been used for decades to diversify investment portfolios. However, many investors are still not familiar with what managed futures are or how they may be beneficial. I’d like to share a bit more about them here.

Managed futures are a type of alternative investment. The term “Managed Futures” describes strategies used by a group of investment managers known as Commodity Trading Advisors (CTAs) who trade futures on a discretionary basis. Managed futures strategies seek to increase investment returns beyond applicable benchmarks without adding commensurate risk. This is often referred to as “seeking alpha”.

The largest proportion of managed futures - accounting for about 90% of CTA assets strategies - are “trend following” CTAs that have the ability to go long or short in various asset classes, including stocks, bonds, currencies, interest rates and commodities. These CTAs attempt to profit in any market environment by riding the trend up when markets are rising and then switching gears to ride the trend down when markets are falling.

Academic research completed since the early 1980s suggests that an allocation to managed futures can reduce risk in certain portfolios by providing diversification benefits. Researchers found that an allocation to managed futures made an investment portfolio of stocks and bonds less risky than if only stocks and bonds were held. Generally, managed futures exhibit low or negative correlation to the equity markets and have the potential to profit in any economic environment. For example, managed futures accounts performed relatively well when almost all other asset classes fell during the 2008 financial crisis.

A typical recommended allocation to managed futures may range between 7 - 12%, depending on many factors, including investor objectives, risk tolerance, time horizon, etc. and also investment advisor familiarity and experience with managed futures. Many advisors who recommend these strategies for diversification purposes will recommend a strategic allocation to managed futures and then overweight or underweight this allocation based on the investment advisors’ expectations for future stock and bond market direction and performance.

There are several ways to access managed futures strategies, including...

- Limited partnerships which have the longest performance history, but involve the additional tax reporting complexity of a Schedule K-1.
- Mutual funds including passively-managed index funds, fund of funds that invest in multiple CTA managers or one specific active manager that has a proprietary trading strategy. Many mutual funds that use managed futures strategies have been introduced in recent years.
- Exchange-traded funds (ETFs) - also in growing numbers.

Investors should be aware of the risks related to investing in managed futures. Diversification benefits in terms of low correlation to other asset classes are not guaranteed. Investment returns are highly dependent on the experience and skill of the CTAs who manage these complex strategies. Also, managed futures accounts tend to use a lot of leverage (i.e., debt) and charge higher fees than traditional investment managers.

However, due to their diversification benefits, institutional investors have been increasingly adopting managed futures strategies over the past two decades. We expect to see this trend continue as investors become more familiar with managed futures and their potential diversification benefits when appropriately used in a well-diversified portfolio.

We believe that managed futures can be a helpful diversification tool for certain investors, and we’d welcome and enjoy the opportunity to discuss their potential benefits with you at any time.
